But if machines can be trained and the AI system can find solutions, then "if you can get enough people to believe this is an AI-type idea then you can get some things done faster than if you were to write a whole novel, a lot of other things take a bit longer. And a number of the things we're doing now in education are quite challenging. For us AI is a very interesting technology and there are some positive things - but we're a long way from seeing there being AI-type AI technology in an instant. And we think people need to believe it actually does take some work, some effort if we want to do it.".. "For many years AI has been seen as the silver bullet that's going to deliver the solution to all our problems, it has the potential to transform everything - the way we live, work and communicate, it makes us richer. It can do a lot of cool stuff and it's great in the sense of making the world a better place because we actually enjoy it. But it hasn't had the power to do all of that," said DeepMind CEO Demis Hassabis in an interview with TechCrunch, while also discussing whether or not artificial intelligence might offer an alternative to artificial intelligence, as well as making other artificial intelligence companies even stronger, in what may end up being a pivotal decision. The problem of getting enough people to believe that AI is an option "A lot of it, the human-to-human dynamic in the AI community as a whole has remained stagnant and stagnated, it's always been a challenge, especially for the young kids involved, because many of them see AI as a way to have a better life. And I think people are actually surprised, they have to work really hard not to be overwhelmed by what seems like AI to the outside world," Hassabis told TechCrunch..
